

The School of Public Health and Community Medicine at the University of New South Wales is committed to excellence in research, teaching and action to enhance health and health services

The following values underpin our work in Australia, in the Asia-Pacific region, and globally and in relation to health policy, research, teaching and practice:

Belief in health as a public good and fundamental right for all

- Commitment to social justice, equity, diversity & multiculturalism
- Recognition of the valuable roles of different perspectives, disciplines and approaches to addressing emerging and existing problems
- Commitment to providing a base for exploring, critiquing, and stimulating dialogue and accountability that will promote transformation of public health, health services and systems

The following values underpin our work within the context of the School:

Commitment to excellence in research, teaching and service, and to enhancing health capacities and services for populations

- Recognition of the crucial and productive interaction between leading edge research, teaching and service
- Commitment to creatively addressing the needs of our undergraduate and postgraduate students, our partners, and the communities and health services with which we interact
- Commitment to establishing an ethical community within our workplace, through promoting fair workloads, mutual respect, open channels of communication, a tolerance of different perspectives and approaches, and opportunities for support and development
- Creation of a diverse, stimulating, flexible, people-centred, reflective and adequately resourced workplace
